Of course it is (the delusion that’s really true)

Peter Byrne

William Burroughs described the paranoid man as one ‘who knows a little of what’s going on’. In that rare beast, a mainstream Hollywood film that portrays schizophrenia with humanity and without a murder, A Beautiful Mind (2001), John Nash (Russell Crowe) irritates his wife when he says he heard the garbage truck outside at night. He has been hospitalised with psychosis and in that movie convention much imitated in life, anything he says must be taken as fantasy, unless proven otherwise. But the garbage guys are outside and thus begins a process where she (and the audience) begin to trust and identify with Nash again.

The hero-journalist of Shock Corridor (1963) feigns psychosis to gain admission to the asylum. He identifies the murderer but no one believes him; his continued incarceration drives him insane. The parents of Claudia Draper in Nuts (1987) conspire to undermine her testimony against a murder charge. Despite her historicisms, Claudia (Barbara Streisand) wins out. Her battle with a bullying psychiatrist is mirrored in The Changeling (2008). A woman’s child goes missing but the Los Angeles police return the wrong boy. To avoid further embarrassment to the police, an unscrupulous psychiatrist declares her insane.

Melodramas take the ‘unbelievable mental patient’ a stage further. Gaslight was a popular drama (filmed twice: 1940, 1944), where a scheming husband tries to convince his dutiful wife that she is losing her mind by making things go bump in the night. As with Parallax View (1974) and All the President’s Men (1975) project the angst of the unbelieved onto a battered American audience, reeling from Vietnam and Nixon. A flavour of paranoia excites modern science fiction (Total Recall, 1990 and the Matrix trilogy, 1999–2003), and in that movie convention much imitated in life, anything he says must be taken as fantasy, unless proven otherwise. But much of it is opposite. To avoid further embarrassment to the police, an unscrupulous psychiatrist declares her insane.

Where A Beautiful Mind succeeds is in drawing in the audience into seeing and believing the content of Nash’s delusions. By the time the film demarcates reality from illness, we have been seduced by his experiences, and we feel his confusion and loss. True empathy.
Of course it is (the delusion that’s really true) – psychiatry in the movies
